CHINA CABINET REDUX

The Logan's home lacked one important element: the built-in china cabinet that defines the bungalow dining room. So they were delighted when a month after they moved in they found one in distressed shape at an antiques shop.

The piece, which was too tall for the house, was stored in the garage for a year before Michael started working his magic. He cut the top off and took everything apart. He stripped off the layers of blue and white paint, flipped the beadboard back so the better side was exposed, replaced the drawer guides and refinished the wood. Because the cabinet had been made to fit in a recessed spot, its sides were unfinished wood, so Michael made new ones out of old wood and added the wood caps on top and bottom of the piece to complement the rest of the home's woodwork.

Today, it is a showcase for the couple's new set of Noritake china.
